Part A — Human Rights

Question 21

Criteria	Marks
• States the meaning of human rights	2
• Makes a general statement about human rights	1

Sample answer:

Basic rights and freedoms belong to all human beings. They are universal, inalienable and inherent in all people. For example: right to life, freedom of religion.

Question 22

Criteria	Marks
• Demonstrates an understanding of how environmental rights are recognised internationally and/or domestically	2
• Makes a general statement about environmental rights internationally and/or domestically	1

Sample answer:

Environmental rights are a fundamental human right recognised in international instruments such as the Kyoto Protocol and the Paris Accord. Domestically (eg in Australia) the right is protected by Commonwealth, state and territory legislation.

Question 23

Criteria	Marks
• Demonstrates a clear understanding of the relationship between state sovereignty and human rights • Uses a relevant example	4
• Demonstrates some understanding of the relationship between state sovereignty and human rights • Uses an example	3
• Makes a general statement about state sovereignty and human rights • May refer to an example	2
• Makes a general statement about state sovereignty AND/OR human rights	1

Sample answer:

State sovereignty is the ability of a nation state to make laws for its citizens without external interference. The relationship between state sovereignty and human rights influences whether there is recognition, protection or enforcement of such rights. For example, a sovereign state may recognise the fundamental human rights as listed in an international instrument (eg ICCPR) and then enact them into domestic legislation. Conversely, a sovereign state may refuse to cooperate with an international instrument, or organisation such as the United Nations, as such rights may not reflect the values of that nation state.

Question 24

Criteria	Marks
- Provides informed arguments for AND/OR against the effectiveness of Australian legal responses in enforcing human rights - Demonstrates a thorough understanding of Australian legal responses in enforcing human rights	7
- Provides arguments for AND/OR against the effectiveness of Australian legal responses in enforcing human rights - Demonstrates a sound understanding of Australian legal responses in enforcing human rights	5–6
- Attempts to provide arguments for AND/OR against the effectiveness of Australian legal responses in enforcing human rights - Demonstrates an understanding of Australian legal responses in enforcing human rights	3–4
- Makes general statements about Australian legal responses AND/OR human rights - May provide an example	1–2

Sample answer:

A number of important human rights have been protected in Australia, although their enforceability varies. For instance, there are explicit rights contained in the Australian Constitution such as the right to vote in Commonwealth elections (s. 41). Similarly, statute law has contributed to the enforcement of human rights through the application of legislation such as the Sex Discrimination Act 1984 (Cth). Common law also reveals how Australia responds and enforces human rights, such as Dietrich v The Queen 1992. The High Court of Australia recognised the importance of a fair trial if the accused represents themselves or has an unqualified person representing them. This right, however, does not automatically allow the accused to acquire legal assistance if they did not meet the criteria for legal aid. The Australian Human Rights Commission (AHRC) was established by the AHRC Act 1986 (Cth). However, this legislation, while establishing the statutory authority, may not lead to binding or enforceable judgements. Some Australian responses to the implementation of international law can also limit the enforcement of human rights. This can be seen with Australia's interpretation of the Refugee Convention 1951 (UN) through the Migration Act 1958 (Cth).
