• Outlines the role non-government organisations play in promoting human rights	2
• Makes general statements about non-government organisations or human rights	1

Sample answer:

Non-government organisations (NGOs) promote human rights by raising awareness of issues both domestically and internationally. Non-government organisations can hold governments accountable by applying pressure to protect human rights. Non-government organisations can also encourage the international community to act when human rights are violated.

The right to education has been recognised over time through international and domestic law. During the 19th century, the Industrial Revolution led to improved access to basic education to enhance the skills of workers. In the 20th century, the international community responded by including the right to elementary education in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The right to education has been further developed in New South Wales through the Education Act 1990 which requires students to remain in education until they are 17 years old.

Sample answer:

The United Nations plays a significant role in the protection of human rights. The UN Security Council can pass resolutions to allow humanitarian measures. Furthermore, individuals can apply to the UN Human Rights Committee for a ruling when their rights under the ICCPR have been violated. However, nations can use state sovereignty to ignore United Nations decisions. Therefore, the UN becomes ineffective in protecting human rights, as illustrated by the ongoing abuses of the Rohingya peoples in Myanmar. Despite this limitation, the United Nations plays a pivotal role in encouraging nation states to protect human rights standards.
